U.S. withdrawal from the Iran nuclear agreement is British Prime Minister Theresa May, who decided to save the deal because she lacks a majority to justify a U.K. exit, according to London's Evening Standard.

"It was May who forced the decision and, if it happens, it is clear that she will be the biggest loser from the move," the newspaper said. In late

October, May, who has served as Britain's leader since July 2016, reached a tentative agreement with the EU that would keep Britain inside the JCPOA, which was negotiated by the U.S., Iran, China, Russia, France, Germany, the U.K., and the European Union. The agreement, which was inked last year, established some time limits for

Iran to implement the JCPOA and opened the door to trade with the U.K. while the EU remained in the deal. Reaction to the U.K.'s decision to leave the JCPOA has been strong since the deal was signed in Vienna. British lawmakers have blasted the decision. "This does not strike me as the right decision," Michael Fallon, the Conservative Party's leader in the House of Lords, told the BBC in October. May's agreement to save the deal was based on an assumption that a Conservative majority in the British Parliament could be maintained in upcoming elections. However,

May's gamble has failed as the Conservatives have seen their parliamentary support dwindle to just one seat in the country's 650-seat

House of Commons. The Conservative Party has been struggling in the polls since May called the June 2016 Brexit referendum. Brexit, the referendum which gave the U.K. the right to withdraw from the European Union, is a major campaign
